The project Transcultural Europe in the Global World focuses on intra-European processes of transculturation. The aim is to reflect on the configuration of Europe and its potential at a time when contacts between different cultures and their interactions are accelerating and multiplying. From a multidisciplinary perspective, the concept of transculturality is used as an epistemological category for understanding the cultural complexity of today's Europe and its role in a global world.

The workshop “Transcultural Europe Narrated: Testimonies, Interviews, Life Narratives” aims to confront the different functions that migrants' stories can play in human, social and political sciences. While individual trajectories are subjected to objectifying categories in public discourse, researchers are increasingly interested in testimonies provided by the actors involved and their capacity to share their stories. What functions do such self-narratives serve? What pitfalls should researchers in the humanities and social sciences avoid when they rely on these accounts?
